HALOTHERAPY

History of Halotherapy

Halotherapy has been popular in Europe for many decades after doctors discovered that visitors to the local salt mines seemed to have few respiratory ailments when compared to the general public. During and after the Second World War people started spending time in the empty salt mines with good results and some abandoned mines were eventually turned into clinics. As the understanding of Halotherapy grew and results were astronomical, specialized salt machines were designed to deliver the salt particles into a room or enclosure to replicate the atmosphere of the mines. These machines have historically been very expensive. Spas and clinics started building whole halotherapy rooms made of blocks of salt brought up from these mines or from the Himalayas. Halotherapy was first identified as a healing modality in the spa industry around 2013 and has been a growing trend since. The Halo One gives the user the opportunity to experience the healing salt regimen at home anytime.
