Does this sound familiar?

You're working hard at your job or business, but...

You can often count the number of People of Color in the room on one hand, including yourself. You put in the same hours and the same amount of work as everyone around you, but it still feels like you're swimming upstream.

You know you're undervaluing your work

It's hard to balance asking for what you're worth and just being grateful for what you have, but it feels like resources and connections that everyone else seems to have access to remain outside your grasp.

You want to believe you can do anything

But the advice you get like "follow your passion" and "fail forward" is not an option. You're one of the few in your family with the college degree and you're the safety net for your family, not the other way around.

Your family still has no idea what you do

You were taught the path to success was get good grades, go to a good college, get a good job and learned the hard way that it was this very structure that was holding you back.

And yet you're still here

In search of your true purpose and the answers for how to break the cycle, build wealth, and do what you love. You're still here because the work is more important to you than the BS you have to deal with to get to do it.
