RGB Guide

Guide to Getting the best from your Retro Consoles

Here's a reference page for everything you'll need to get the best from your classic consoles. Some things can be confusing, but stick with it, as it should all come together in the end!

Please note that this site is written by an American, so most of the references are to US-related stuff. I still tried to include basic Europe/PAL related info as much as I could.

So, are you ready to completely transform the way your old consoles look, just like the pic above??? Let's get started!

Summary:

In order to display your systems in RGB, you'll need special cables that get the RGB output from your system. Then, you'll need to choose how to display RGB, which could be anything from an RGB monitor to a new HDTV. Finally, you'll need a way to connect your system into your display. I'll explain all of that in easy guides, but I'll save the section that describes each individual game console until the end:

- 1) Introduction to RGB – If you're not familiar with RGB, please read this page.
- 2) SYNC – Everyone should read the section that describes what SYNC is. Even people who are already familiar with RGB may find it useful!
- 3) How to Display RGB on Your TV – Now that you understand RGB, you'll need to decide what's the best way for you to display it. I recommend RGB monitors, but this section describes pretty much all your options.

 Here's the weirdest question I've asked here: What's everyone wearing for sneakers these days? I've been wearing old-man-back-support sneakers, but now that I'm healed, I want decent ones. I used to wear Nike's, but the last few pairs I bought fell apart in a month. I wear 11.5W
