Everything old is new again! Long before the current pandemic sent professors zooming into the digital ether with electronic instruction, there was something called Educational Television. And UH was a trailblazer for that early version of remote learning. In fact, KUHT is credited as the first educational television station in the country. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, the station broadcast more than 100,000 semester hours of telecourses, including this social psychology course taught by Professor Richard Evans, a noted scholar and frequent guest on Johnny Carson's Tonight Show, another use they found for TV.
