FEELING IN 40 SECONDS...

WITH OUR COACH'S HEADSETS

The NFL play clock is only 40 seconds. That's all the time players and coaches have to put together the perfect play. The result could be pure elation or frustrating disappointment—but it's all orchestrated beforehand, behind the scenes. Explore the anatomy of a real NFL play where this coach's headset had a crucial role under pressure. It delivers for play-callers and playmakers, so they can deliver real feeling to the fans in 40 seconds or less.

WITH THE GAME ON THE LINE

67,000 fans in the stadium—and millions more at home—nervously anticipate the play. The Seahawks are on Green Bay's 35-yard line, in overtime. Score a touchdown and they win. Win, and they go to the Super Bowl.

: 4 0

Through the elements—crowd noise, weather, pressure—the offensive coordinator, line coordinator and head coach analyze the situation: field position, down, yards-to-go. In this case, it's 1st and 10, and they're right on the edge of field goal range.

: 3 0

The offensive coaches determine an approach, quickly exchange a few words and call the play. Then the coordinators communicate with position coaches to get the right guys on the field to run the right play.

:15

The play is relayed to the guys on the field, and gets called in the huddle.

THE RESULT

With no safety help in the middle of the defense, Russell sensed an opportunity deep. After a perfect play call, he delivered a perfect throw, and hit his receiver deep down the middle. And he caught it for the game-winning touchdown! The 12s went crazy in CenturyLink Field as the coaches, Russell and his team have sent the Seahawks to their third Super Bowl.

THE THRILL

With the game on the line, NFL coaches rely on our headsets to call the plays that thrill the crowd. It's the same technology we put into our headphones—the ones that deliver the thrill of your music.
